Introducing Bertie.

Bertie is a freestanding lounge armchair designed for lounging, relaxing and waiting. Its inviting upholstered form gives people somewhere comfortable to sit back, read, or simply take a break. Built for the parts of a building where someone just needs somewhere good to sit for a minute.

Colour confident.

Where most lounge chairs hide their structure, Bertie’s tubular steel frame is on show, which turns it into a drawn line in the room.

Powder coat the frame to match the upholstery for a single confident block, or set the two against each other and let the frame do the drawing. Either way the chair holds its own in a neutral fitout without needing to shout.

Notes from the floorplate.

Low back, long sightlines

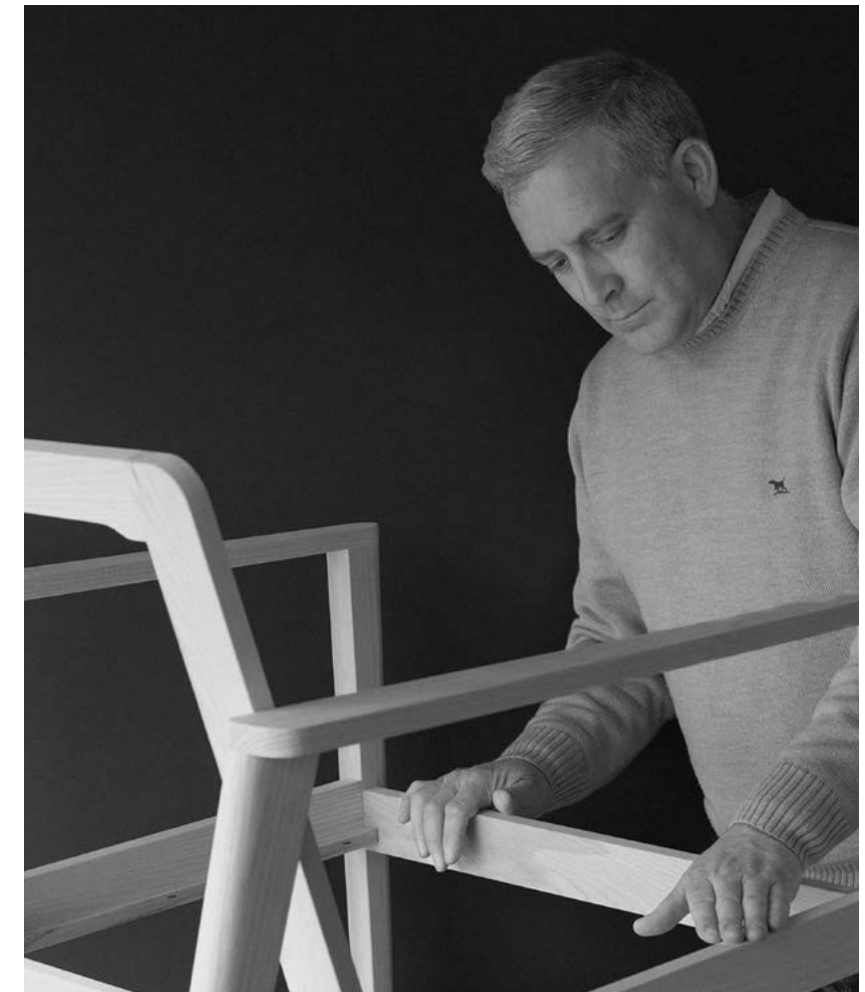

At 750 high, Bertie sits below eye level for anyone standing. In a reception or foyer, that means you can furnish the waiting area properly without losing sight of the entry, the desk, or the person you're meeting.

Arms make a solo seat legible

People will occupy a defined single seat in a shared space long before they'll sit at one end of an empty sofa. Bertie's frame draws a clear boundary around one person, ideal for spaces where most occupants arrive alone. In a waiting or lobby setting, place chairs at an angle to one another, a slight turn reduces the risk of awkward eye contact.

A setting, not a fixture

Bertie can be pulled into a pair for a conversation and pushed back to the wall afterwards, which suits spaces that change use between morning and evening. The trade-off is that it will move. In high-traffic areas, anchor the setting with a rug, a low table or a planter so the arrangement has something to return to.

Crafted for connection

A table height, a seat angle, the feel of a particular fabric. It's the subtle details that pull people together, or quietly hold them apart. They're the difference between a space people admire in passing and one that really works. That's what we do.

Beautiful, highly configurable furniture, made to spec, designed and built in New Zealand.
